country—makes many tings which is not true, and der mouth and der head."

What could be mean? A bright thought struck me; they were actors, that must be it. "Many tings which is not true—in der mouth, in der head." I had a clue at lest: theatrical people are always running off with other people s wires and hu bands, and saeing for divorces, and intriguing generally, all over the world. Can any one think of the reason? Is the secret bidden in the footing has or rolled up in the curtain? Or is there semething fatal to fidelity in the air of the green-room? Certain it is, that those who personate fictitious heroes constant to wives and and lady loves through difficulty, and danger, and death, and heroines, who would sacrifice every thing sare virtue, draw few practical lessons from their nightly representations of those virtuous characters. FRIDAY ...... NOVEMBER 30 From the law poem of "Owen mercettin, a roung Indwer," in one Combill Magazine for November, we make this extract:

A Picture of a Great Thoroughfare-Its Bright and Dark Side. A woman correspondent writes from New We go down Broadway with lingering We go down Broadway with lingering steps; we lounge along, and stop now and then. At times it is a trifle of dress, soctio in its expression, or a lovely picture shown in the truest light of Heaven's wealth of yelow sunbeams; a confusion of foreign tops tempts one's lost childhood back again, or billows of draped silk swell, fold above fold, A woman residing in the East thus relates the manner in which she became jealous

Apropos of brides, there is a window dedicated to them and their needs exclusively; When first we moved into the house in which we now reside, I noticed one very dis-agreeable peculiarity in relation to the adjoining block of bouses. They had no back door yards, and consequently the windows closely overlooked our gardens, which were dedicated to them and their needs exclusively; a window that ought to have cornices Cupid-carved, and be emblazened with hymenial torches, and other recognized symbols of wedlock. It is one of the so-famous Tucker show-windows. Fleecy bridal vails float wooingly from orange-blossom chaplets. That they are illusion provokes sundry sarcasms from our bachelor brothers. N'importe; bridal bouquets, natural as art's perfection can render them, bloom in fadeless beauty, imclosely overlooked our gardens, which were not very large themselves, though they were pretty. When we first took possession of our new residence, the windows directly opposite ours were closed, and the apartments untenanted. I had scarcely got to rights and fairly settled down, however, before I perceived great renovations and improvements were in progress in these great empty rooms. Painting and papering, whitewashing and gilding, scrubbing and window-washing was the order of the day for a fortnight. And then, after a short respite, white shades render them, bloom in fadeless beauty, im-mortal as should be the love and union they ing was the order of the day for a fortnight. I did hope they were not inquisitive, disagreeable people.

And all the time he sat there, that impudent thing stared right at him without moving an inch. I thought it was strange that F-satter did not observe her. All day We had a friend, Sago was in a delicate state of health, believed to be consumptive. ago was in a delicate state of nearth, believed to be consumptive. He lived several hundred miles from us, and although our family were intimately acquainted with himself, we knew neither his home nor any of his family; our intercourse being chiefly by letters, received at uncertain intervals.

One night, when there was no special cause for my mind reverting to our friend or to his state of health, I dreamed that I had to go to the town where he resided. In my dream I seemed to arrive at a particular house, into which I entered, and went straight up stairs into a darkened chamber. There, on his bed, I saw S.—— lying as if about to die. I walked up to him and, not mournfully, but as if filled with hopeful assurance, I took his hand and said: "No, you are not going to die. Be comforted, you will live." Even as I spoke I seemed to hear an exquisite strain of music sounding through the room.

On waking, so vivid were the impressions remaining that, unable to shake them off even the next day, I communicated them to my mother, and then wrote to S.——, eaquiring after his health, but giving him no clue to the cause of my anxiety.

His reply informed us that he had been Every day the same thing was repeated; but I purposely avoided saying any thing to Psalter, as he had not seen her, lest he should look toward her out of curiosity, and then, of course, she would think he was overwhelmed with admiration. Sister-in-law was quite a near neighbor of ours, and ran in every day; and one after-noon I casually mentioned the circumstance to her as a good joke. Sister-In-law looked

His reply informed us that he had been very ill—indeed, supposed to be at the point of death,—and that my letter, which for several days he had been too ill to read, had been a great happiness to him.

It was three years after this that my mother and I met S——in London: and, the conversation turning to dreams, I said, "By the way, I had a singular dream about you three years age when you were so ill;" and I related it. As I proceeded, I observed a remarkable expression spread over his face; and when I concluded he said, with much emotion, "This is singular indeed; for I too had, a night or two before your letter arrived, a dream the very counterpart of yours. I seemed to myself on the point of death, and was taking final leave of my brother. "Is I knew it was foolish, but I could not help thinking of what she had said for hours afterward, and I caught myself looking at the window fifty times does I seemed to myself on the point ofdeath, and was taking final leave of my brother. "Is there any thing," he said, "I can do for you before you die?" "Yes," I replied in my dream, "two things. Send for my friend A. M. W.—. I must see him before I depart." "Impossible," said my brother; "it wouldbe an unheard-of thing; she would never come" "She would," I insisted, in my dream, and added, "I would also hear my favorite somata by Beethoven, ere I die." "But these are triffes," exclaimed my brother, almost sternly, "Have you no desires more earnest at so afterward, and I caught myself looking at the window fifty times a day.

"Where are you going?" I inquired of Pasiter, as he left the house one moraing just after the breakfast was on the table.

He gave me no definite answer, but merely replying that he would return in five minutes, closed the door and departed.

As I awaited his return, I happened to turn my eyes loward that window. There so the woman, but her back was toward me, and on the window-reat beside her lay a hat so like Pasiter'a. The longer I looked the more convinced I was that I was not mistakes: and yet the idea was so ridiculous, so preposterous, that I felt I should never have husbanded it for one moment, had it not been for Jane's suggestions. I drove the thought away and went into the house; but when Pasiter neturned, I couldn't help looking at the window—and, oh! dear me! the hat had disappeared. rifles, exclaimed my brother, almost sternly.

I cried and scolded myself, and scolded myself and cried all day long. In the afternoon I walked round the block for the purpose of inspecting the building which contained that someone. Financial Affairs.

Yesterday (Thanksylving) was generally observed by the Financial operators of Thirdstreet, all the Banking-houses being closed. The Banking quarter looked deserted; the Capitalists and Money-changers having withdrawn from the thoroughfare and forgotten—perhaps—premiums, discounts and per cents for one day only. The stringency of the Money market troubled no one; for no one had ought to pay. Notaries lost their terrors, and Bank-messengers their significance. Thanksgiving thrust itself between the leaves of ponderous ledgers, and left a blank for the so-called holiday.

The Bankers gave thanks, we hope; but we doubt if they did; knowing not, it may be, what or whom to thank, just now. Persons swimming for life in mid-ocean are rately grateful for being there, and starving wretches are not generally disposed to bless God that they were created poor.

Giving thanks at this time is justly regarded as a profound joke. The appointment of the day was one of Governor Dennison's pieces of waggery; but then it was a trifle lil-natured and out-of place to have a Thanksgiving, with the country in a distressed Financial condition and on the eve of dissolution.

Was the thanksgiving in consideration of dissolution.

Was the thanksgiving in consideration of the alleged fact that South Carolina is about going out of the Union? If so, put us down for six large dinners and a score of protracted prayers.

A suspicion haunts us that the naming of A suspicion haunts is that the haming of thanksgiving at this juncture may have arisen from an impious idea. Possibly, the Governor, knowing that Providence has not of late been as kind as usual to us, and is, perhaps, neglecting our good people, has taken this method of int mating to the Sovanians and information. ereign Ruler His shortcomings, and informing him that his carelessuess of our condi-

We hope this is not so, and yet we fear.

Thanksgiving is over—we are glad—we give thanks for that at least, Yesterday's Louisville papers thus refer to

Wednesday:

There was nothing new in the Money market yesterday, and no variation in the price of Currency or Exchange. The old complaint of stringency was applicable to muchetary affairs, for yesterday was one of the worst days of the crists. The provision market was profeunding dull, but there was no quotable change in rates. Measure, Stewart & Barber report a sale of 16 brls, mass Fork at $15 by an outsider to close out. They report also sales of 150 bris, at $16; 60 green Hams at 75c. and 60 tierces head Lard on private terms. Jobbers shipped 8 tierces prime Lard at 11c; 4 casks nive when Jean Bacon Sides at 135c., and 10 casks old Bacon at former rates. There were no sales of Hogs, dealers having reduced their figures. Small lots are pressing on the market, but dealers are not willing to operate at the asking rate, which is 50 set.

Our Wednesday's New York exchanges thus refer to Tuesday's Stock market. The Stock market opened to day with a very heavy feeling throughout, and prices fell off during the seesing at the First Board. There was, however, is slight improvement toward, the close, and after the adjournment a moderate raily took place, which carried New York Central up to 75 again, and extended also to several leading Stocks. The movement in State Stocks and Railway Bonds was quite animated, but prices were somewhat fragular, in some instances showing better figures, but in most of the transactions comparing less favorably with the quotations of yesterday. There has been a very good investment demand for Railway Bonds, and the quantity taken out of the street within a week must be large. We hear of an instance where the Bonds on company to the extent of $150,000, he can also be a very dear to the current of investment days for shares continue to be received by the Commission-houses, but the current of investment has offsterun more in favor of Bonds. The searcity of stock is still one of the prominent features of the market, and the difficulties in making delivery have made the Bears more caution in the Billing for cash and on short sptices. New York Central, Surlington and Quiter, Galerna and Hudword River are particularly scarce. At the Second Board the market was dail, but considerably better than at the morning session, and later in the day there was a further strengthening in quotations, with but a moderate busines. The downfall within two or three days has been almost as sudden and decided as the rise which preceded it, and the tendency new to another rebound is quite natural to the ordinary working of the market.

Concerning New York Monetary matters on Tuesday, Wednesday's Tribuse observes:

There was a very fair amount of business transacted in Foreign Bills for the Boston steamer, with an improvement of about 1 per cent, in rates, closing with an unward tendency. The most favorable feature of the market known was the greater case with which Bills could be sold, and marked changs from the stagnation of the early part of last week.
